Emerging RIM Trends: What's Up Ahead?

by Paul Haskins, Director of Knowledge and Information Management, CGI

With the means to collect limitless information and retain it with perfect memory we are increasingly challenged to reconcile digital and human memory. Paul's presentation will explore the emerging range of capture systems and the raw memory they create. He will contrast his with our human understanding of memory and our current society and etiquette on which this is based. Paul will highlight the emerging issues that we face in business and personal lives as we determine how to participate in an information-driven society.

About Paul Haskins

Paul Haskins, Director of Knowledge and Information Management Consulting Services, is responsible for Web2.0, eChannel and Collaboration strategy development and Information Management projects at CGI. During his 22 years in the software, international service and IT sectors he has gained extensive senior level experience leading project teams in both the public and private arena and currently heads-up the CGI Information & Knowledge Management Practice in Ottawa.

Paul is a certified AIIM Enterprise Content Management Specialist and member of International Institute of Business Analysts (IIBA).

Is Information Management Dead?

by Stephen Donahoe, Director, Information Management, CGI

In today's outsourced, disposable society, public and private sector organizations may be tempted to trust technology to manage our information assets. In addition, if it were not for the requirement to comply, we might very well ignore Information Management (IM) all together!

This session will present the argument that IM as a discipline may no longer be needed due to advances in technology. Driving factors behind IM, and generational and behavioural issues, will also be discussed. Audience participation will be encouraged so that the premise, "IM Is Dead", can be refuted or supported.

About Stephen Donahoe,

Stephen Donahoe is the Director responsible for CGI's strategic information management (IM) and enterprise content management (ECM) consulting practice. He is recognized as an IM and ECM thought-leader by both the public and private sectors. Superior communication and negotiation skills enable him to deal with end users, stakeholders and senior managers when determining IM and ECM requirements at both the enterprise and business unit levels.

Stephen holds Bachelors of Arts and Education degrees from the University of Ottawa. He holds Enterprise Content Management Master Status from the Association of Information and Image Management (AIIM). He has spoken at local, national, and international conferences and seminars.
